Forum Axess

The objective of Forum Axess is to disseminate the results of scholarly work and research and generate conditions for bringing together academics, journalists, writers, the business community and the general public.

The Foundation’s vision is to support individuals, ideas and humanistic projects that run the risk of finding themselves outside current trends, but which, in the long term, are deemed to be of decisive benefit to the public interest by preserving traditions and by renewing and developing society. The motto is “excellence and access”.

The Foundation focuses on a small number of humanistic areas and projects that have prospects of providing effects deemed to be long-term and of high quality. Driven by a sense of civic responsibility, the Foundation exists to conduct activities of long-term, decisive importance for the development of society from a comparative international perspective. The aim of its activities is to initiate and explore new ideas and methods and to transfer the resulting knowledge to society.

A community thrives on human encounters. The Foundation aspires to constitute a forum for independent, intellectual and spiritual discussion in Sweden, an important element of which is to introduce an international, interdisciplinary humanist debate.

The Foundation’s publishing arm summarises the diverse activities of the Foundation and makes them accessible to the general public through seminars and conferences, publications in the form of books, a humanistic scholarly magazine and television programmes broadcast through the Foundations television channel, Axess TV.

The Swedish Success Story?
24th to 27th of August at Engelsberg Manor

The modern project promises that man can create the world anew. Sweden in the 20th century was a supreme embodiment of that promise. During that century it evolved from a minor state on the fringes of northern Europe – with no foreign policy function in the European system of states (other than as a potential ally of Germany against Russia) and with a population many of whom dreamed of getting out of the country as soon as possible – to a world ideological alternative.

The formula had already been expressed in 1936, in Marquis Childs’ book Sweden: The Middle Way, in which Sweden was seen as a possible midway between the individualist USA and the collectivist Soviet Union. Sweden seemed to represent compromise, a balance between self-assertion and subjugation.

Modernity aims to eliminate contradictions between freedom and equality, between state and society. In many people’s eyes, no state achieved more headway in these respects during the 20th century than Sweden. It became a symbol of modernity. The freedom which Sweden sought to realise has been a “freedom to”, aimed at making possible a “freedom from”. In this “freedom from” modernity seeks its own enigma, its own inherent meaning.

Sweden in the 20th century was also to actively assimilate the notion that it could abolish the contradictions of modernity. Modernity became Sweden’s self-image: the promise of a future which had left historical ties behind it, a harmonisation of modernity sustained by perpetual and continuous peace.

Sweden entered its fourth age of greatness: at one time (in the 17th century) a military power, in the 18th century it had become a great power in the field of science (Linnaeus, Celsius and others) and then, in the late 19th century, became a great power in the field of engineering (“industries of genius”): telecommunications, ball bearings, electronics. Starting in the 1930s, Sweden faced the modern age with its eyes wide open, and the fourth age of greatness began. From this perspective, the Second World War could only be termed a deviation, a temporary dip in the development curve. The casus belli between the great powers was really no concern of Sweden: the war centred round problems which Swedish society had already left behind it. Then, after the war ended, the modernity project could be resumed with full vigour. Under Social Democratic leadership a welfare state was formed, intended to give people the freedom which would enable them to realise their potential and in doing so find the meaning of secular life.

In one field after another Sweden, in relation to the size of its population, took the lead. An advanced technological culture resulted among other things in Sweden having two car manufacturers when most comparable countries had none at all. Swedish industry was able almost single-handed to rearm the country’s armed forces with ultra-modern weaponry. A close-knit social insurance system appeared to provide comprehensive security. Equality between the sexes is another pivotal criterion of a country’s modernity. Here again, Sweden took the lead.
For just over a decade now, though, the Swedish self-image has been disintegrating. “The world’s most modern country” – the paradigm no longer serves as a benchmark for the future. Sweden seems to have lagged behind. Swedish self-esteem is rocking on its heels. The welfare consensus supporting post-war society has been broken. What used to be the bulwark against harmful influences from the outside world – the policy of neutrality – seems to have lost its relevance in a world from which the great power blocs have vanished. After accession to the EU, Nato membership beckons. Sweden’s go-it-alone approach is finished and the sense of leading the world and being unique has gone. Sweden itself no longer believes in modernity – in the model of progress, willingness to negotiate and technical progress which was once fundamental.

Such, in part, is the perspective in which we have found the themes for this conference, aimed at drawing up a balance sheet for Sweden’s 20th century.

The 20th century came to an unexpected ending. For a long time during the Cold War, two evenly balanced blocs appeared to be confronting each other, but suddenly the communist empires collapsed, at the same time as capitalist societies introduced a revolution in information technology, the further consequences of which we can, at present, only guess at. Meanwhile, the outlines are appearing of a genetic engineering revolution which is probably going to change the world even more than the IT revolution has done already.

There have been other periods in history when people have felt themselves faced with steadily accelerating changes, but never, it seems, has that feeling been more justified than today. We have a profound crisis of orientation: everything that used to be solid is evaporating. The old patterns of interpretation are weighed and found wanting. What economic, political, and technical opportunities and problems lie ahead of us and by what values and norms are our actions to be governed? The unexpected ending of the 20th century reminds us of the unpredictability of future developments, but without asking questions of this kind we will be less prepared than ever for the complex issues with which we are going to be confronted.

The world that is now taking shape as we enter the 21st century seems different in many ways from the world we have been accustomed to. What kind of society awaits us? What role will be played by the nation state and what lies in store for political democracy? What counterpoises will there be to global capitalism? What will the working life of the future be like? How will science and technology develop? What kind of wars and conflicts will we see?

What is the import of being human if we are able to take evolution into our own hands, and what would be the political and cultural implications of such possibilities? What will become of our collective and individual identity in a world so changeable and devoid of frontiers? What will become of imagination and artistic narrative in a culture where opportunities for virtual experience and interactivity are so great and in which reality itself is tending to become more and more virtual?

Why does religion matter? Many answers have been put forth including that it grounds values, creates purpose and gives meaning in an ontological sense to our existence. Often science turns religious experience into an epiphenomenon but unfortunately offers nothing in return. How can modern society deal with this deficit of meaning?

The position of religion in the Western world today presents a contradictory picture. On the one hand there are many indications of a far-reaching secularisation having taken place. Traditional religions are in many places losing adherents and common knowledge of tradition is diminishing.

Has the individual, in religion as in other matters, become an individualistic, “cherry-picking” consumer? There are indications that the hectic pace of the information society and its insistence on flexibility probably are transforming the conditions governing religious experience.

Man’s increasing progression, through science and technology, from being created to himself becoming a creator, is probably also impacting on his relation to religion. On the other hand, it is arguable that secularisation is a myth. Perhaps people today believe in other things and in other ways and possibly this really implies a revitalisation of religious life.

Now, just as previously, there is a great need of meaning and coherence and the discrediting of the political utopias, which in many ways were substitute religions, has put religion back in focus again. Science is triumphant but apparently has little to say about the meaning of existence and the nature of good and evil, even though it sometimes takes on an element of religious conviction itself.

The new choices confronting us, for example due to the development of biotechnology, are perhaps making the normative system of religion still more important. There are fears today of Western societies being fragmented, partly because they are no longer held together by common convictions and norms, and religion is perhaps necessary as an integrating force.

At the same time religion is obviously contributing towards fragmentation by giving rise to sects and fundamentalist movements. How can religious convictions be united with the pluralism of modern society and its insistence on respect for dissidents? Will the fundamentalist movements, like communism, be vanquished by Western liberalism, individualism and consumerism, or will they, on the contrary, acquire added importance? Or will the Gnostic “tradition” instead shape the future, with its scepticism towards doctrinal faith and its emphasis on inward enlightenment?

All beings so far have created something beyond themselves. Do you want to be ebb of that great tide, and revert back to the beast rather than surpass mankind? What is the ape to a man? A laughing-stock, a thing of shame. And just so shall a man be to the Superman: a laughing-stock, a thing of shame.

You have evolved from worm to man, but much within you is still worm. Once you were apes, yet even now man is more of an ape than any of the apes.

Friedrich Nietzsche

Thus Spake Zarathustra

Does scientific research exist for man, as we understand him today, or is man something that exists for research, in its endeavour to realise the new man? Friedrich Nietzsche prophesied about this a little more than a hundred years ago, but where do we stand today? Nietzsche’s interpretation of Darwin’s theory interestingly portends present discourse.

The claims of the new biotechnology – apprehensions aside – must be allowed to be tested and in routine democratic order be addressed, in advance, by an earnest and serious debate concerning its potential consequences. What prospects has mankind, given the blessings of science in the shape of cloning, artificial intelligence and organ banking? How do theologians, philosophers, historians and social scientists look upon this progression? What is the humanistic response to what appears to be a new and seemingly victorious paradigm?

Is it due time to ask if evolutionary biology has gone too far by claiming issues that perhaps only can be addressed by philosophy and theology? Biology seems to maintain that it is essentially a matter of degree alone and not one of a kind that separates man from other animals. The resistance to the new technological advances in the field of biology and genetics likely derives from this very demotion and even qualitative deterioration in man’s status, value and significance in the cosmos. In short, his ontological significance, even his very being, appears to be under attack from an apparently impersonal rational demiurge lacking all accountability: an altogether rational, free-floating, scientific reason.

Yet how does the present level of progress of science look from a historical perspective? What about science’s history of broken promises? On what exactly does this culture’s immense optimism but also its apprehensiveness hinge? Are we the victims of a utilitarian, bordering on pedestrian, philosophy when individual suffering can be examined only in the shadow of a far greater but entirely unpredictable future? Could it be that we are facing a new battle of universals, out of which will emerge a wholly new vision of man?

At the Engelsberg seminar, no answers are taken for granted and all avenues of approach are kept wide open. Yet one thing is certain: if biotechnology is able to keep its promise, then we are situated squarely in the middle of Nietzsche’s prophecy. Perhaps nothing can prevent this development, but then perhaps we can try to understand it, should we perchance remain the same human beings following the future triumphs of science.

Europe in recent decades has been increasingly characterised by an ethnic and cultural diversity with a growing non-European element. The conflicts and problems arising in this connection are perhaps to be viewed as a species of teething trouble on the road to a fruitful hybrid culture. Coupled with a growth of socio-economic stratification, they can also mark the beginning of a profound fragmentation whereby ethnic subcultures, instead of being integrated with European societies, reject the values and norms of the dominant culture. There are fears of such a society becoming characterised by strong suspicion and hostility, a “conflict of civilisations” in the everyday context.

The trend towards even greater ethnic and cultural diversity in Europe seems inevitable in the century that lies ahead of us. The European population is ageing steadily, and all the indications are that its low birth rate will have to be made up for by means of large-scale immigration. What will it take for this kind of Europe to become a smooth-running society? What demands will be made on European societies and on people migrating to them? On what philosophical and political foundations is such a society to rest? What, for example, will be the role of religion? Will a cosmopolitan culture arise as a consequence of generation changes, with new generations becoming less and less tied to their ethnic identity and adopting a global culture and lifestyle? Or will separate identities flourish but prove less of a problem than expected; perhaps the fear of them is just a legacy of the homogenisation ideals of modernism?

There are perhaps important lessons to be learned for the future by studying the situation in present-day Europe. Different countries – France, Britain and Germany, to take just a few examples – have adopted different standpoints on immigration, and comparisons between them could provide important clues for what a future policy might bring and what can Europe learn from the United States, with its long tradition of being a melting pot?

It is a widespread perception today that reality and media images are merging, the media becoming our reality. Shakespeare’s words “All the world’s a stage” would today be expressed: “All the world’s a studio”. We are bombarded with images and information from a global media network, which is spreading an increasingly fine-meshed net over our everyday world and our self-perception. Narcissus sees his reflection today not in a pond, but a screen. What mind creates this symbiosis between media and mentality? Power over opinion has always been an important dimension in politics, but today the dramaturgy of the media probably has more influence than ever before. How does it affect politicians and the thrust of politics?

If the media really have such power over politics and the mind, there is reason to ask who has power over the media and what governs the actions of these players. How do editors and journalists perceive the world? What do they base their stance on? Do media owners have set agendas, or do they simply try to adapt to whatever they think will sell? How do media moguls deal with other centres of power – political, economic and military? What power do advertisers have over the editorial content of the media? What role do the media play in forming the new world order, today seemingly dominated by the USA?

On the one hand, ownership in the media world is being concentrated; on the other hand, control over information has been much more difficult to acquire. During the war on Iraq, a network of individuals in the USA created their own alternative news agency, Commandpost.com. From Baghdad, via a blog, the Iraqi “Salam Pax” gave his views on the war – critical both of Saddam and the USA. No discussion on media power today can ignore the small players. They are developing new behavioural patterns, both as producers and as consumers. The question is if in the final analysis it is the consumers, through their preferences, who have the last word, rather than the commercial media. Criticism of the media for “dumbing down” could then be rephrased: where have all the thinking consumers gone?

Or is it conceivably so that mass media and mass communication require archetypal themes to dramatise the message in order to capture their readers/spectators? Are mass media consumers furthermore in fact stirred by low gossip and great stories whether true or false in substance? If this is the formula that media are, consciously or unconsciously, determined by – where are we to end up in the future?

Empire got itself a bad name during the past century but recently more and more voices are making themselves heard in the international debate, speaking up for the notion of empire as a “benign form of order”. For instance, the British historian Niall Ferguson argues in his book Colossus for the notion of an American – yet reluctant – empire in the making.

We now know that the fall of communism did not, as many had expected, lead to a new world order. History did not come to an end, but seems to have taken a leap into a new era, whose contours are yet to be revealed.

The Engelsberg Seminar 2005 invites participants to discuss the subject of empire and world order from both historical and present perspectives. Is for instance the United States an empire? If it is, are its population and elite prepared to shoulder such a burden? Can an empire play a positive role in creating a stable, liberal and democratic order? What characteristics must an empire have to be successful in the long term? Or are imperial ambitions in fact essentially destabilising? If so, what are the alternatives to empire when it comes to creating a stable world order?

Are there other power centres in the world, such as the European Union and China, which can and want to challenge the US in this role or build supporting empires? What role will these giants play on the global stage? Historical analogies can provide us with a guide and valuable advice for the future, but only if used cautiously. What can be learnt from the history and development of the Roman, Ottoman, Spanish, Habsburg and British empires based on the concept of empire as a benevolent form of order?

Which bodies can promote an international order that creates stability and encourages development towards democracy and respect for human rights? The United Nations was intended to be such an organisation, but as its 60th anniversary approaches, it is difficult to feel unbridled enthusiasm. Its victories have been many, but its failures hard to endure; even the Secretary General, Kofi Annan, a couple of years ago asserted that the entire UN system was in need of radical reform to regain its legitimacy. However, what can the UN accomplish without the approval and collaboration of powerful nations?

The only remaining superpower or hyperpuissance, the USA, through its unique position, plays a central role in the world order, but as developments in Iraq show, it is more difficult to win the peace than to win the war. What is the state of the US resolve and its ability to find allies? Europe appears the self-evident partner in such an alliance. Historical and political ties are strong – but perhaps they are dissolving. Europe has frequently distanced itself from US foreign policy, but what alternatives could the European Union offer? And last but not least, the often stated fact that globalisation is bringing the world closer does not of necessity lead to greater affinity: it may just as well create greater awareness of differences and in its turn lead to new conflicts.

Only a few decades ago, the future of religion in the West seemed predictable and there was good reason to suppose that the rest of the world would follow suit, with society growing increasingly secularised. The question of the future of the secular state could be deleted from the agenda, for the simple reason that there would be ever fewer believers to challenge it. Evidence to the contrary – in America for example – was simply dismissed.

The theory seemed to have the backing of historical logic. Secularisation and the secular state marked the culmination of a long process in the West whereby Christianity had steadily lost ground. The ideas of the Enlightenment were surely in ascendance. Modernity indeed implied secularism. Science and social progress appeared victorious in the contest for souls and society. But western secularism was never without its complications: extreme utopian political creeds, such as communism and fascism, were arguably quasi-religions in their own right.

At the start of the 21st century, however, it seems as if we have entered a post-secular era. Religion has proved itself important in ways that have widely different meanings. The experience may be primarily an individual, inward concern, or it may represent the core of certain movements which respect, or profess to respect, the secular state but claim the right to determine its member’s lifestyles. But movements have also appeared which aspire to leave their imprint on society as a whole and thus to abolish the secular state. Are these fundamentalist movements akin to the religions whose divisions had such a destructive impact on Europe?

How is the secular state to act in relation to these manifestations of religions? Should it endeavour to remain neutral, as in the US, or support religion but show equal favour to all convictions, as in India? Does a weak state religion act as a safeguard against rivalry between religious groups as arguably it does in the UK, or should a strict distinction between church and state prevail as in France or Turkey? What are the prospects for constructing secular constitutions in the Middle East, after the coalition forces dismantled a singular secularist, Saddam Hussein? Does it matter if those prospects are slight? And how should Europe respond to and fight the movements which challenge the secular state and perhaps wish to gain control of it? Under what conditions will those movements challenge such a state and in what ways? And above all, can the secular state endure in the long term without a secularisation of society? That is to say, if a majority of the population is religious, will they accept a secular state?

In this conference these issues are discussed in a threefold manner: first the historical forces behind the emergence of the secular state and society are outlined, and then the threats to secular society considering Europe and Islam are discussed taking examples from different European countries, and finally the future of multicultural society is addressed.

After a life lived in India, Rudyard Kipling famously remarked that East is East and West is West and never the twain shall meet. But now they do: through immigration, through travel, through globalisation. But are the terms West and East merely a mental map that creates boundaries where none should exist? Can the distinction be meaningful when it is used to explain everything from the division of the Roman Empire to the Cold War and now the fight against jihadism? Japan, Brazil, Israel and Australia all defy geography to claim to be “West”. Despite Russia’s European Christian roots it still counts as “East”.

Substantive or not, the terms determine our cultural self-awareness and the way we make sense of the world. Since Oswald Spengler’s Der Untergang des Abendlandes, Westerners (and others) have been discussing its future. More recently, Samuel Huntington has cautioned of a clash of civilisations in which the West will lose its pre-eminent place.

Is the defining feature of the West hostility to the East? Edward Said’s critique of Orientalism, once fashionable, is now discredited. The new theory is that Westerners have been bewitched by the riches and civilisations of the East: close observation and awe have been the hallmarks of that, not ignorant belittlement. Maybe the real prejudice today is not the idea of the “noble savage” but the outsider’s “Occidentalist” stereotypes about “depraved Westerners” and their dehumanised culture and society.

So how and where did ideas about the Western world arise? And how far are they accurate? How far is technological innovation and industrialisation a “Western” phenomenon? What are the spiritual characteristics and features that define the West today? Answers to these raise new questions. How do non-Westerners in modernised settings perceive the West? Are old national identities giving way to a new common Western identity at least, or at first, in Europe? Can the Euro-Atlantic European and Russian history have long been intertwined. Over the centuries, the Russian Tsars tried to turn the Russian people towards European culture. Peter the Great opened a gateway to the West by creating St Petersburg (on what was then Swedish soil). Catherine the Great was absorbed by the ideas of the Enlightenment.

Yet there also linger long term, perhaps deeper, divergences. The influence of the Enlightenment was fairly superficial in Russia, compared to other European countries. The move to the industrialisation was less of a development than a leap – made first during the 19th century, a phase that was interrupted by the First World War, and then later forced through by Stalin.

Could Russia have become part of a similar development that took place in other parts of what we now call the West? On what does the alleged Russian sonderweg actually depend – geographical factors, language, religion, or cultural differences? Russia has not been asked to join the European Union, nor have the Russians themselves shown an interest in joining. Some argue that it depends upon geopolitical factors, or that Russia is too large to become a member, bordering Norway in the west and North Korea in the east, covering eleven timezones.

After the fall of the Soviet Union at the end of the Cold War, so-called shock therapy was applied in Russia in order to rid its people of the communist joke for good. But did the West have the right response? Did relief at the end of the Cold War blind it to potential risks? One might ask if the legacy of Russian history doomed its post-communist experiments, and also what the long-term influence of the Orthodox Church has been on Russia’s relationship to the West at a cultural level.

Today, many observers are alarmed by recent developments. From a Western perspective, things appear to be moving in the wrong direction: away from democracy, free media and the rule of law. Questions abound as to how Russian society may be developing.

In this conference we addressed such issues, focusing on the following broad themes: continuity and change in Russian history and the Russian self-image, recent economic developments, the “near-abroad”, and the implications of the resurgence of the strong Russian state.

What is the origin of “the American idea”, how has it been shaped by history, and where is it heading?

In this conference, we will try to gain a clearer understanding of the original ideas and sources for what is known as the American idea, examine how this idea is nurtured in the US today and received elsewhere in the world, and consider the question of whether we are now approaching a “post-American world”. Who, in that case, will take over the US role as global leader – China, Russia or India; what kind of world would we then live in, and what ideals would we thus be guided by in the future?

The fate of the US is inextricably linked to Europe, and its inhabitants are without a doubt Europe’s most successful colonists. As early as the late 18th century, Americans had liberated themselves from the mother nation Great Britain and through clever moves managed to gradually eliminate competing colonial powers in North America; for instance, Louisiana was purchased from France and Alaska from Russia, the Spanish were expelled in 1898, and only a weak Canada remained under the British crown. America became the home of freedom, especially religious freedom, a place of refuge for those who were persecuted for their beliefs, and the country of free enterprise. Not only that – as the historian Thomas P. Hughes writes in American Genesis, “Men and women assumed, as never before, that they had the power to create a world of their own design.”

The US was already on par with Britain in many respects by around 1900, but it was the mistakes that the Europeans themselves made, in the form of the First and Second World Wars, that prepared the ground for the US, allowing it to become a real global power. After the collapse of the Soviet Union, the US finally emerged as the undisputed winner of the Cold War. Despite America’s positive self-image, the world has never really perceived American ambitions in the same way as the US evidently does. Instead of being seen as a liberator, the US rather has in general been viewed since the Vietnam War as an imperialist nation acting in sheer self-interest.

Today, following America’s efforts in Iraq, which have been less than successful and have had little backing, and with a financial crisis predominating in the midst of a recession, there are once again suggestions, like during the 1980s, that the American era is over: back then, it was Japan; today it is China and India that will probably take over from the US. But Russia’s Prime Minister Putin has also long entertained hopes of recreating Russia’s pride and glory. War in Georgia, among other places, has clearly filled this function, as have various forms of threatening manoeuvres against some of its tiny neighbours. The energy weapon in Putin’s hands may come to have great significance for Russia’s future ambitions for world power.

Fareed Zakaria writes in The Post-American World that “It is an accident of history that, for the last several centuries, the richest countries in the world have all happened to have small populations.” Now, he argues, nations with large populations are instead rapidly on the rise. “It is these two factors – a low starting point and a large population – that guarantee the magnitude and long-term nature of the global power shift.”

Do a low starting point and a large population really guarantee this global shift in power, and is it an accident that small countries have historically been more successful than large ones in creating prosperity? History will show whether Zakaria is right in his claim.

What then are the founding myths of the United States, how have the Puritans and the idea of the New World shaped American history and the country’s destiny, and how are these reflected in the American Constitution and present-day politics? How have key events in American history, like the American Civil War, the 1898 Spanish-American War, FDR and the New Deal, the First and Second World Wars, Korea, Vietnam etc., influenced the American idea?

Furthermore, how does the influence of American national myths colour today’s American national consciousness, and how is this reflected in the American economy, in literature, art, and film? How is the idea of America reflected in the country’s reputation around the globe – in the Arab world, Europe, Russia, Asia, South America?

Can America remain the top dog and should it? Are we beginning to see the beginning of the end or is it still only the beginning of the American era?

With the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 and later Fukuyama’s famous thesis about the “end of history”, many people believed that history had taken a completely new turn towards freedom, liberalism and the values of Western Enlightenment. But happiness does not last forever. Today, twenty years after the fall of the Wall, nostalgia is spreading in the media, and many communists and critics of the free market are seeing their chances after the dramatic economic developments we have experienced in the stock markets and elsewhere since the summer of 2007.

Are we really facing a return to a society governed by planned economies at the global level or is it simply a blip on a curve from the perspective of eternity? What does the future of capitalism look like? Will the successful variety of capitalism from the past few decades that we call globalisation continue or will regional and perhaps even strong national forces gain ground in the international arena on economic matters?

In this conference, we will first look back in time and consider the rise of economic man in the anthropological sense. We will follow this development in history through the theories and ideologies that mankind has used to try to control economic impacts and movements in history.

We will reflect on the lessons that can be drawn from the recent crisis in intellectual and political terms from a comparative perspective and then shift to speculations about the possibilities, or the impossibility, of correcting or preventing financial bubbles.

What non-economic factors influence capitalism in its various forms of expression? Weber talked about the Protestant work ethic and the spirit of capitalism, Montesquieu emphasised the importance of climate in our economic activity. Today, when capitalism is advancing in Russia, China, Brazil and India, we consider what importance culture, religion and climate have for the development of capitalism in these countries and what social and political consequences this will have, for instance, in rural parts of India and China. Will we see new environments of Dickensian dimensions develop, for instance in Asia?

Who will be winners and who will be losers in the future capitalist game: Asia, the US, Europe, India, or will regions without national agendas step up and form new centres of power?

What are the real threats to global capitalism and what social problems do they create? Will there be not just enormous economic growth but also acute poverty and alienation in the wake of global capitalism? What sleeping forces will come to life when traditional patterns of living, culture and religion are challenged by this capitalist wave, what security problems will this development give rise to, and how will the absence of nations as objects of identification affect the identity and self-image of people in the future?

Where are we heading in the global political landscape? Will old ideologies disappear, fade away or be reborn, and if the former is the case, what will the new ideological landscape look like and how will it affect the conditions of political life? The death of ideology has been predicted repeatedly over the years, but time and time again we have also seen old ideologies return under new covers.

Most of the major political parties in the Western world have, in recent times, moved towards the centre, motivated by the idea of universal welfare, and in our global era all Western states embrace the idea of the welfare society.

In a country like Sweden, some on the left see the adjustments of the Social Democratic party as treason or an adaptation to “neo-liberalism”, blaming the decline of the party on its drift towards the “right”. Meanwhile, in the conservative and liberal parties, critics rail against the adjustment to the left in their own parties.

Nevertheless, the centre-rightwing alliance in Sweden has won two elections in a row with this policy. Do these developments signal a general international trend, where the old struggle between labour and capital has finally been settled in a universally embraced welfare ideology, and classical social democratic components are spiced up with a dose of life-style liberalism?

All over Europe, parties characterised as national “welfare huggers” are being set up. That includes the Sweden Democrats, a party difficult to pinpoint on the left/right scale, and whose sympathisers are often members of the labour union.

Not everyone, however, sees “the end of history” in the form of the welfare state. Irrational exuberance of course also applies to careless politicians who have allowed citizens to over-consume, as in Britain and Greece. Some have also begun to question the sustainability of the welfare state as such, asking how deep the cuts in the welfare systems will be in the developed world. In some ways the “sacred cow” of universal welfare has already suffered its first serious blow; families with an income over £40,000 in the UK will no longer receive child care benefits from the state.

And last but not least: some ask whether the national welfare state in the long run is compatible with liberal ideals such as free immigration.

In this conference we will address the present but also the past. We will highlight some of the historical political ideas and systems which impact on the present. We also look at authoritarian state capitalism, as in the case of China, asking if it is sustainable. And if it is, how will it influence the world? Will it become the exemplary model, just as liberal democracy has been for a long time to many peoples and nations? Will Islamism, xenophobic and anti-immigrant parties and other movements on the fringes of the political and ideological spectrum in Europe, US and the Islamic world, strengthen the existing order of things, or undermine confidence in them? And what are the long-term consequences of the recent developments in the Arab world – liberal democracy or democracy bringing Islamism to power?

Has globalisation meant that politics has taken a quantum leap, so that the ideologies from the 18th and 19th century – communism, conservatism, social democracy and liberalism – are no longer relevant as expressions of the class interests that characterised the modern era? In the final analysis, what are the implications of globalisation for politics and ideology? Will a world parliament, a worldwide green movement, or various movements with religion as the common denominator be the answer? Or will we perhaps instead see the return of another old phantom: nationalism?

In Greek mythology, Europa was the Phoenician princess whom Zeus pursued and raped while dressed as a white bull. But if Europe was once a Greek dream, she has inspired several subsequent dreams in the aftermath of war and disaster – of unity, peace, national cooperation, a single market and latterly a single currency – which now seem to haunt the present. Will the modern European project be derailed by the sheer ambitions of those dreams?

But what is Europe? Is it merely a continent, a geographical entity? And when did it come to have any sense of identity or political unity?

Did Europe become a rallying cry to stave off the bellicose nature of Europeans as a misplaced peace initiative? The pursuit of the idea of Europe has been a story in itself.

This conference will seek to probe Europe’s historical antecedents, and to establish the self-perceptions of Europeans across a wide range of its past. When did Europeans start to identify as European? Why has European unity been so elusive in history? And as the French historian of the 19th century, François Guizot, once remarked, that Europe’s strength and creativity is in its very lack of unity. Something, after all, needs to explain the sheer dimension of Europe’s creativity in the arts, music, painting, sculpture, literature, sciences, physics, philosophy, political ideas and so much more: indeed it invented most of these spheres of learning and human expression. As the birthplace of Western civilisation, Europe invented much of the modern world.

But the term Europe has in fact meant different things at different times. Herodotus spoke of the world being divided into three parts: Europe, Asia and Libya, with the Nile and the River Phasis forming their boundaries. By the 1st century, the geographer, Strabo, stated that the eastern frontier was at the River Don.
The Engelsberg Seminar

A definition of Europe as the lands of Western Christianity arose in the 8th century, signifying the contrast with Byzantium and Islam. Europa often figures in the letters of Charlemagne’s cultural minister, Alcuin. In 1730, the Swedish geographer and cartographer von Strahlenberg proposed the Ural Mountains as the most significant eastern boundary (instead of waterways), a suggestion that found favour throughout Europe.

Today, the word Europe is often used in a geopolitically limiting way, to refer only to the European Union, or even more exclusively, a particular culturally defined core. However, the Council of Europe has 47 member states and only 27 are in the EU. Also, people living in outlying areas or islands such as Ireland, the United Kingdom, the North Atlantic and Mediterranean islands as well as Scandinavians may refer to “Continental Europe” or Europe simply as “the continent”.

What were the intentions of the early founding fathers of the European Community? And what of Europe’s future in this respect? Will Europe stick together or will we once again be hearing the eerie cry evoking the spirit of British weather forecasts from the 1930s: “Fog in Channel; Continent Cut Off.”

What is civilisation? I don’t know. I can’t define it in abstract terms – yet. But I think I can recognise it when I see it...” Sir Kenneth Clark’s use of the term “civilisation” in his series with the same name illustrates the ambiguity of the concept; it can therefore perhaps best be described as an Idealtypus similar to Max Weber’s concept, in that its legitimacy can be determined only in terms of adequacy.

Civilisation has been described as a set of values of a people or society; it can indicate a level of economic development, and can also point to a certain level of intellectual and artistic excellence. Furthermore, it can denote a boastful ideal of sophisticated civility, distinguishing our own regular habits from those of our neighbours. The distinction between what is supposed to be civilised or not has often bordered upon the xenophobic, and has sometimes also very much been an expression of that: not only the ancient Greeks distinguished between themselves and other peoples that they saw as barbarians.

Another distinction of importance in more modern times is the notion that the German peoples are cultured whereas as French and Anglo-Saxons only display a superficial civilisation without depth; a notion that played a significant role in propaganda during the First World War.

But what are the roots of civilisation and how did particular civilisations emerge in the ancient world? What do we today have in common with early civilisations, and what values do we still uphold that have their origins in the ancient world?

What explains the rise and fall of civilisations, and how did the present Western ideals of civilisation emerge? In what way have the alleged values of past civilisations re-emerged as exemplary models in a new context? How true is the popular golden age stereotype “already the Greeks”? What is really unique about Greek culture and which cultures influenced what we recognise as Greek?
The supposed superiority of Western culture and its achievements was for a long time taken for granted. However, in the era of globalisation countries like India and China are already challenging Western dominance.

Rome conquered Greece, but it is said that Greek culture conquered Rome; will we see new civilisations emerge and dominate the world, or will the challengers instead in practice become Westernised as Western technology and capitalism triumphs? And will then “Greek culture” once again conquer “Rome”?

In the final analysis: is it possible to sustain a civilisation without the use of aggression and the willingness to defend its values by means of war?

God is dead. God remains dead. And we have killed him. Yet his shadow still looms. How shall we comfort ourselves, the murderers of all murderers? What was holiest and mightiest of all that the world has yet owned has bled to death under our knives: who will wipe this blood off us? What water is there for us to clean ourselves? What festivals of atonement, what sacred games shall we have to invent? Is not the greatness of this deed too great for us? Must we ourselves not become god simply to appear worthy of it.

Friedrich Nietzsche

The Gay Science

Even though Nietzsche declared God dead more than a hundred years ago his shadow still seems to be more than just looming. More than 80 percent of the world’s population has a religious affiliation. In secular states religion continues to play an important role in public and intellectual life. Politics and international relations can’t be understood without accounting for the element of religion in cultural contexts. Indeed, in order to understand ourselves we need to understand religion.

This conference will investigate the role religion plays in society today and in the past. We will examine religion in relation to the human condition and religion as individual experience. Or as William James put it in one of his Gifford Lectures in 1901: religion as “feelings, acts, and experiences of individual men in their solitude, so far as they apprehend themselves to stand in relation to whatever they may consider the divine”.

Starting in the Near East we will discuss the early religions and what their existence tells us about ancient societies and the needs of human beings of past civilisations. We will analyse the existence of a “sacred economy” in the Uruk culture, the notion of “ordered chaos” in ancient Indian thought and religion as collective practice in the Hellenistic and Roman worlds. We will continue with a conversation on the many varieties found within the Abrahamic tradition and what it means for our view on Judaism, Christianity and Islam today.

The second day of the conference will concentrate on religion in relation to the fundamentals of the human condition. How has religion dealt with human experiences such as suffering, violence or love? And how has the sensation of the divine been interpreted outside the confines of orthodox religion? We conclude the day with an overview of how cognitive sciences and neurology understand religion and the way religious belief can be viewed in light of evolutionary theory.

Understanding in what ways religion matters and why we are religious also means looking at its role in current politics. Using the situation in the Middle East as a lens the conference will highlight the problems and possibilities of religion in international relations. Furthermore, we will discuss religion’s role in modern society, a society that maybe more accurately should be referred to as “post-secular”. Is God back? Or did he just never leave?

According to Herodotus, the Persians taught their sons three things only: “riding and archery and truth-telling”. There could be no empire without warriors. This seminar will deal with war as both creator and demolisher of civilisation, and investigate the driving forces of armed conflict through a long historical perspective. What role does war play in the creation of societies?

During three days we will consider the long history of war, current conflict zones and the future of armed conflict. The first day will examine the intrinsic part war plays in the formation of societies and the concrete driving forces behind armed conflict. Can we see any patterns? What does the constant recurrence of conflict say about human nature and the human condition?

We will also explore how war has been perceived – from the discrepancy between the eye-witness accounts and the official propaganda of the Thirty Years’ War to images of war in contemporary jihadist poetry. What are the realities of war and how do writers and thinkers explain them?

During the second day of the seminar we will focus on the 20th century and the wars that defined the era and still shape our understanding of modern conflict. We will discuss the world wars, the transition from the Cold War to small wars and current conflict zones such as the Levant and the Russian borders. We will also ask what the future of war will look like as advanced technology challenges accepted concepts of strategy and combat.

We will end Engelsberg 2015 by investigating the current and future role of the US in a world where large-scale conflicts seem increasingly likely. We will also discuss the question of Europe in the Atlantic partnership. What threats to peace and security are on the horizon? What wars will shape our time?

“Foremost among the countless blessings of war is its power of teaching geography”, an old joke goes. The geographical element of international politics endures despite technological advances, the forces of globalisation and the spreading of liberal democracy. The seas, the rivers, the deserts and the mountains continue to shape our world order. Would Russia, past and present, have acted differently had there not been the vast North European Plain? Would India and China have seen each other in a different light in the absence of the great Himalayas dividing them? And would Sweden have been able to keep its two hundred years of peace had it not been embedded in a buffer zone of friendly neighbors?

This seminar will address the question of geopolitics both as reality and ideology. The geographic foundations of a country will inevitably shape its identity and prospects. Natural resources, ecology and climate must be considered if one wants to understand a territory. Yet, as static as the geographic foundations might seem, our perception of them differs widely. As the history of cartography shows, there are many ways of mapping the world. Politics is shaped by geography, but the understanding of geography is also shaped by politics.

The first day of this seminar will tackle the question of the “geography factor” and how we should define and comprehend geopolitics. We will discuss the concept in relation to history and the attempts to overcome the cage that geography seems to impose on world politics. We will also discuss early empires and geopolitics – from the Greeks of antiquity to the Mongol Empire.

The second day will focus on the issue of competition and strength embedded in the concept of geopolitics. We will discuss “sea powers”, interconnection and early globalisation; the dramatic history of France and Germany, also referred to as “the engine of Europe”, and the role geopolitics as ideology played in the horrors of World War II; and we will examine the competition between the United States and Russia over the past century and the renewed tensions visible today. The day will end with an analysis of the geopolitical situation of the High North. Is the two-hundred-year-old Swedish peace under threat?

We will sum up The Engelsberg Seminar by examining present geopolitical hotspots like India, China and the Levant. What lies ahead and what lessons can we learn from history? What will the return to geopolitics mean for the world order?

In just a few intense and dramatic weeks, the new generation in the Middle East showed its discontent with the regimes in place. What role will Islamists play in the new Middle East? These and more issues were discussed in the first seminar.

Shia Expansionism
The second seminar in the series “Middle East: Shifting Sands”, which explored and debated the character and future developments in this challenging region.

The Wikileaks reports seems to confirm what many have long suspected: that the ayatollah regime in Iran has an offensive strategy to expand and strengthen the Shia Muslim strategic influence throughout the region – from Afghanistan to Saudi Arabia, from Iraq to Lebanon.

Does Iran have the financial resources and well organised networks to realise a Shia Muslim political breakthrough in the region? What role does the Iranian nuclear programme play in such a strategy? Can the “Arab Spring” of 2011 result in Iran’s emergence as the leading great power of the Middle East?

Moderator: Nathalie Besèr, Journalist

The revolutions in the Arab world may change the political systems. At the same time they will also have an effect on the financial situation in the region.

How do the current political developments affect the financial prospects of this region? What will be the long-term consequences? How should Europe respond to its neighbours? What are the biggest challenges to sustainable economic development in these countries?

Moderator: Nathalie Besèr, Journalist

The fourth seminar in the series “Middle East: Shifting Sands”, which explored and debated the character and future developments in this challenging region.

The Palestinian Authority is making an effort to build a state in the West Bank that is supposed to be completed by the end of the summer.

What obstacles remain before the Palestinians get their own state? What are the consequences for Israel and the region? How stable is the agreement between Fatah and Hamas?

Roots of Violence – an interdisciplinary seminar in honour of Ambassador Rolf Ekéus

Recent events, including the uprisings, revolutions, warfare and ongoing violent repression in Syria, Afghanistan, Sudan, Somalia and many other places around the world, as well as isolated incidents of mass murder such as that at Utøya, Norway, and the recent killings in Toulouse, France, confront us with difficult questions about human nature. War, ethnic conflict, revenge, terror and genocide – such acts have occurred through the millennia but how much do we know about where they stem from? The seminar aimed to explore the roots of these outrages from different perspectives. We looked at the past and compared the experiences of different periods to understand what conditions provoke violence. We introduced the insights of psychology and biology, as well as the learning of historians and political scientists. By looking at religion and its relation to violence, political violence and the state monopoly of violence, the meaning of war and terror, we sought to fasten on some of the causes of the darker parts of ourselves.

Do we all carry within us the roots of violence? Are we born with aggression and rage and is it equally distributed or is it something passed on to us through culture and society? Is it possible to understand its meaning, or meaninglessness? Do violent reactions always create more violence? What is the relationship between freedom, justice/injustice and violence? What role does religion play? And last but not least could it be that we are becoming less violent and is it possible to find ways to create peaceful societies, or are we doomed by human nature to perpetrate the evil that we want to resist?

The Axel and Margaret Ax:son Johnson Foundation organised the seminar to facilitate interdisciplinary discussion of the roots of violence and disseminated the results through Axess Magazine and Axess TV.

Who Takes Care of World Heritage Sites?

The Unesco Convention on World Heritage was ratified almost 40 years ago. The intention was to secure our shared cultural and natural heritage, make it accessible and bring it to life for all people. Almost 1,000 cultural and natural sites from more than 150 countries around the world are included in the official World Heritage List. In Sweden we now have 15 items including such diverse environments as the Royal Domain of Drottningholm, the Church Town of Gammelstad, the Agricultural Landscape of Southern Öland, the Naval Port of Karlskrona and Grimeton Radio Station in Varberg. The Swedish list also includes Struve Geodetic Arc, a series of data points which at the beginning of the 1800s made it possible to define the exact size and shape of the globe. This summer the decorated farmhouses of Hälsingland were added. The World Heritage Convention supports the idea of a common human heritage. It is time to summarize the ideas of the Convention and how it is translated into reality. It is also time to evaluate what we now want to accomplish with our heritage and what we want from the future. The owners of World Heritage sites are usually public authorities or organisations, but may also be private individuals or companies. The World Heritage properties exist under different conditions and types of management. Who is ultimately responsible and who cares for World Heritage?

How has the World Heritage issue evolved and how have the original ideas around a common cultural and natural heritage been understood?

What does World Heritage status mean today, and what are the consequences of a World Heritage listing for the different sites?

What happens to them after they have been established? What are the positive and negative effects due to the development of accessibility and exploitation? How do Unesco and national authorities consider the differences in ownership and character of the World Heritage sites? These are some of the issues that this seminar discussed. Invited speakers were professors, managers, architects, curators and researchers in the cultural and natural heritage area. The seminar took place at Engelsberg Ironworks, an industrial complex that reflects the physical and business environment from 1600 to the 1800s.

Can Non Profit Save the Swedish Welfare Model?

The Swedish Non-profit Sector in a Comparative Perspective: Historical Legacies, Contemporary Politics, and Future Prospects.

From a global perspective, Sweden has a small, service-producing, non-profit sector. This is a function of the historical transition from private charity to social rights, and the subsequent dominance of the public sector, which for long had a near-monopoly on the provision of education, healthcare and social services. However, in the wake of the radical reforms of the Swedish welfare state, which separated the financing from the provision of services, a market for providers of education, healthcare and elderly care has emerged. New possibilities have opened up for both nonprofit and for-profit actors to establish themselves as major players in the provision of welfare. This development has revealed a need for a deeper understanding of the role of philanthropy and the non-profit sector – past, present, future – in Sweden. In response, we invited a number of leading scholars and public intellectuals from the UK, the US, Germany and the Netherlands to join with Swedish counterparts in a two-day conference on the Swedish non-profit sector. The first day provided a comparative input from abroad; the second day focused on Sweden. The first day was conducted in English; the second day in Swedish. The conference tackled the current debate over the future of “the Swedish model” including hot-button issues like the emergence of for-profit providers of core welfare services, the return of charity and the rise in private, supplementary insurance.

Images of Sweden II

While Sweden has some of the lowest crime rates in the world, Swedish crime fiction has become one of its booming industries. From Stig Larsson to Henning Mankel, the modern crime thriller genre is dominated by Swedish fantasies. Where once Sweden was associated with the inner turmoil of a Bergman film, the upbeat pop extravaganza of ABBA or the stripped pine of an IKEA kitchen, the girl with the dragon tattoo and her tormenting experiences have become an identifying feature of modern Sweden. What explains this extraordinary phenomenon? Does the absence of realistic bogeymen make fantasy the only recourse for those determined to see the world in such stark Manichean terms? Has this changed the reputation of Sweden?
Sweden’s political reputation remains remarkable: the inferences drawn from it are nonetheless manifold. After its own debt crisis of the early 1990s, Sweden’s restructured economy has stood above the fray of the European financial crisis, and served as source of guidance to many countries seeking a way out. What does this signal for Sweden’s model of political development? How has the image of Sweden changed in recent years? How has Sweden used its experience of debt in the early 1990s? And how comparable is it to the situation facing other European countries today? Can Sweden’s free market reforms in education, health and pensions be replicated in other countries? For many people of very different political persuasions, Sweden has stood as a beacon of political sanity and well-organised welfare arrangements. Its education and health systems are enviably well maintained. Sweden’s welfare system combines with a thriving globalised marketplace. Furthermore Sweden’s role as an ethical diplomat affords the country prodigious international influence. But how is it that Sweden is cited as a model for those on both the right and the left of the political spectrum in countries such as Britain?

For Sweden is a model not just for Guardian readers in Britain, but as its own political outlook subtly shifts, it has become a model for those on the right of the political spectrum also. Swedish free schools have been cited repeatedly as a model for the Conservative government’s new school agenda, as has the lead it has taken in childcare arrangements.

How did this situation arise? How did Sweden become a model for countries whose populations and circumstances are so different and so varied? Has it been useful and pertinent? And is the model described above so very model? Is there a gap between perception and reality? Is there a yearning for a different political order?

In the spring of 2013 Moderna Museet dedicated a major exhibition to Hilma af Klint (1862–1944), featuring many works that had never been shown in public before. This retrospective exhibition of a pioneer of abstract art was Moderna Museet’s tribute to Hilma af Klint as one of the greatest Swedish artists. A woman whose work is still not widely enough known, Hilma af Klint eschewed representational painting as early as 1906. Between 1906 and 1915 she produced nearly 200 abstract paintings, some of which are in monumental formats.

Like Vassily Kandinsky, Piet Mondrian and Kazimir Malevich, who have long been regarded as the main protagonists of abstract art, Hilma af Klint was influenced by contemporary spiritual movements, such as spiritism, theosophy and, later, anthroposophy. Hilma af Klint’s oeuvre builds on her awareness of a spiritual dimension of consciousness, an aspect that was being marginalised in an increasingly materialistic world. When she painted, she believed that a higher consciousness was speaking through her. In her astonishing works she combines geometric shapes and symbols with ornamentation. Her multifaceted imagery strives to give insights into the different dimensions of existence, where microcosm and macrocosm reflect one another. Hilma af Klint left more than 1,000 paintings, watercolours and sketches. Although she exhibited her early representational works, she refused to show her abstract paintings during her lifetime. In her will, she stipulated that these groundbreaking works must not be shown publicly until 20 years after her death. She was convinced that only then would the world be ready to understand their significance.

Moderna Museet’s retrospective exhibition presented Hilma af Klint’s most important abstract works, as well as paintings and works on paper that had never been presented publicly before, enhancing our understanding of her oeuvre. Her extensive diaries and notebooks were included in the research for this exhibition, which comprised paintings and works on paper and toured internationally in 2013–2015. The Axel and Margaret Ax:son Johnson Foundation together with Moderna Museet arranged this two-day meeting to provide an opportunity for discussing Hilma af Klint and her work. The seminar is a part of the Foundation’s ongoing effort to disseminate scholarly knowledge.

Immigration and Migration
Humans have a long history of migration. Throughout the ages we have been constantly on the move across the globe – sometimes to find new partners or better hunting grounds, climate or soil; sometimes to flee enemies but also to conquer, our sights set on other people’s property, food and women.

In a world of rapid population growth, war and globalization, immigration and integration are among the most pressing issues and challenging problems of the modern era. They involve two of the most essential principles of an open, liberal society – freedom of movement and the right of ownership.

Today these principles are being discussed in much of Europe, backed by both economic and political arguments. For instance, in many countries, political parties are gaining ground with their implicit argument that immigrants are a drain on their nation’s collectively owned capital. In other words, the collectively owned welfare state is incompatible with freedom of movement. Some argue instead that immigration is in fact economically beneficial, while others maintain that it constitutes a cost for the recipient society. Still others insist that immigration on humanitarian grounds should take place no matter what the cost is to the host country.

How is this debate being conducted in Europe and where is the debate in Sweden headed? For or against free immigration and integration? Speakers from Germany, the Netherlands, Britain, Spain, Hungary and Sweden shed light on how different countries in Europe view and handle migration issues.

Ten Years of Urban City Research – The Art of Placemaking and the New Urbanism

The Engelsberg Manor’s Seminar & Debates on placemaking and the New Urbanism explored a nexus between social life and urban form, that of placemaking and especially its relation to New Urbanism.

The seminar also focused on the future of urbanism(s). The seminar featured talks and panel sessions by renowned urban design theorists and/or practitioners and advocates. Moderator will be Tigran Haas, KTH – Royal Institute of Technology, and organizer is Peter Elmlund of Ax:son Johnson Foundation.

The seminar explored the concept of placemaking which implies a strong preference for things associated with “good urbanism” and a preoccupation with the “liveable and vibrant public realm” within the framework of “building sustainable communities and places”.

Placemaking also emphasises the combination of the physical characteristics of places, the activities performed there, and the significance (or meanings) that these places have for people.

The Art of Seeing the Invisible – on Hilma af Klint and Other Visionaries

This international, interdisciplinary symposium aimed to examine the Zeitgeist at the turn of the 20th century, with its dramatic interplay between the revolutionary new expressions within the arts on the one hand and scientific breakthroughs on the other. Both these developments were fascinated and inspired by the ideas coming from the occult currents at the time such as spiritualism, theosophy and anthroposophy.

What were the causes for this eruption of creative visionaries at this particular point in time? What are the commonalities behind their ideas and expressions and in what ways did they give shape to the new forms of art as well as views of humanity in the new century? How can we understand the occult roots of modernity, the idea of the individual, modernity and the beginnings of abstract art? How were the cultural, historical and physical realities changed in a time of radical technological breakthroughs such as the X-ray, electromagnetic waves and the telegraph? What can we learn of this intriguing interplay between the artistic, scientific, cultural and spiritual spheres? Who were Hilma af Klint’s contemporaries and in what way did these ideas influence both her and their work?

The symposium was organised together with Moderna Museet in order to create a dynamic discussion about Hilma af Klint and her historical context as well as to further the understanding of the influences upon art and science at the turn of the 20th century, as a part of the Foundation’s ongoing effort to disseminate scholarly knowledge.

Today’s urbanisation process faces both great challenges and great opportunities. A fundamental challenge for most mayors and city administrators today is that the apparatus for building and managing cities – professional and legal systems – is adapted for a 20th-century industrialist realm that focuses on technical systems, whereas the 21st-century focus should rather be on human interaction. A political initiative on the local level is needed in order to change these objectionable building traditions that conflict not only with the contemporary economic system, but also with the long-term goals of the building industry and the needs of ordinary people. The organisers of the Future of Places conference series – United Nations Human Settlements Programme (UN-Habitat) Project for Public Spaces and the Ax:son Johnson Foundation – are convinced that the most productive way for a renewed approach to cities is a shift of focus from objects (architectural displays) to places (public spaces). This conference series aimed to demonstrate and reiterate that simply having access to public space is not the sole concern; equally as important is the planning, design, and management of these public spaces. The primary objective was to ensure that a people-centered agenda highlighting public space as a priority of discussion, became part of the 2016 UN Habitat III conference on reshaping the “urban agenda” for the 21st Century.

Future of Places comprised a series of three conferences, one a year in the lead up to Habitat III in 2016. Citizens from over 50 nations attended the first conference; the hope was that they would be able to influence their domestic representatives attending Habitat III, and ensure that public space plays a fundamental role in the new urban agenda. In terms of the economic, social and ecological pillars of sustainability (and often a fourth cultural pillar), a high-quality public space environment can have a meaningful impact, significant benefits and play a major role in the economic vitality of urban centres (be they large or small). A public space is therefore a necessary part of a successful regeneration strategy in towns, cities, and the wider communities. Furthermore, the social dimensions of public spaces are essential in terms of democracy, inclusiveness and openness to all citizens, regardless of age, ethnicity and gender. With adequate design and management public spaces can create contemporary agoras and foster social ties links and networks of a kind that have recently been disappearing in many urban areas. Public space has always been the nexus of conflict and struggle over claims to its control and over the rights of occupation of different groups in society. The contemporary postmodern condition of the city, the escalating economic crisis and the societal divide has created new forms of insurgency and appropriation of public spaces in the wider sphere of the right to the city by different ethnic, social, economic, age and cultural groups. Examples of successful and prominent public spaces can be found both in developing and developed countries, from the great square of jemaa el-Fnaa in Marrakesh to Plaça del Sol in Barcelona or the new Superkilen urban park in Copenhagen, from Stockholm’s Kungsträdgården to The Circle in uptown Normal, Illinois or Plaza Hidalgo in Mexico City.

Colourful Images – Past and Present Perspectives on the Work of Hilma af Klint

The exhibition at the Hamburger Bahnhof in Berlin entitled Hilma af Klint: A Pioneer of Abstraction, ran until October 6th, 2013 and was produced by Moderna Museet in Stockholm after a comprehensive study of the artist’s archive, and was a stepping stone for further research into the artistic œuvre of Hilma af Klint.

In considering the influence of cultural, intellectual and scientific movements of the late 19th and early 20th century upon the work of the Swedish artist a vast number of questions can be raised and discussed. To what extent did spiritism, theosophy and anthroposophy form the art and culture of modernity? What significance can be ascribed to biology and vitalism in af Klint’s representations? What were the opportunities for development and the limitations in the artistic career of women around 1900? Many of these topics were already reflected upon during the run of the exhibition in Stockholm.

The one-day international symposium held in Berlin discussed the significance of Hilma af Klint’s œuvre for the history of abstraction, a question that was much debated in the context of the exhibition. Furthermore, we traced and debated the influence of colour theories on the works of af Klint. Finally, the exhibition staged at the Hamburger Bahnhof, Berlin’s museum for contemporary art, created a rare opportunity to consider the relevance of Hilma af Klint’s œuvre for contemporary artistic production.

This international symposium was arranged by Axel and Margaret Ax:son Johnson Foundation together with Hamburger Bahnhof Museum für Gegenwart Berlin in order to create a dynamic discussion about Hilma af Klint and her historical and contemporary context as a part of the Foundation’s ongoing effort to disseminate scholarly knowledge.

Images of Sweden III

In 1946 English replaced German as the first foreign language to be taught in the Swedish school system. The process of replacing German with English had been going on for some time, but there had certainly been voices raised against the reform. German elite culture had a strong standing among Swedish intellectuals and studying German was considered essential in getting access to the deep currents of European history and civilisation. By the mid-forties, however, opposition to English as first foreign language was hard to find. German had been tainted by the atrocities of World War II and it was clear that the future belonged to the Anglo-Saxon cultural sphere.

The language reform of 1946 illustrates a change in Swedish-German cultural relations. If the cultural ties between the two countries had seemed almost unbreakable in the early 20th century Sweden was now looking in another direction for inspiration and ideas.

Yet in Germany, Sweden would keep its allure. The image of Sweden in the German context can be described as almost utopian during the second part of the 20th century: the country that is what Germany could have been.

In this seminar we discussed the different images of Sweden in Germany – of both past and present: Swedish-German relationships during the 20th century and what shaped them; the reception of Swedish literature historically and its role today in the shadow of the successful Swedish crime novel; the changing perception of Sweden in German media and the limitations of the “designed” image of Sweden.
In a time when German and Swedish cultural relations are growing stronger again, is Sweden still going to be perceived as “Swetopia”?

A one-day Future of Places seminar was organised by the KTH – Royal Institute of Technology in Stockholm on the theme “The Art and Science of Placemaking: Conceptualization, Grounding and Understanding the New Paradigm in Urbanism”. people from 40-plus countries that were interested in advancing the public space agenda. The conference included plenary discussions, academic sessions, practical workshops and discussion forums as well as key events throughout the beautiful city of Buenos Aires.

The speakers highlighted a broad range of issues in relation to public space (rapidly urbanising cities, street networks, building cities to human scale, multidisciplinary spaces, land value capture, a city-wide approach to planning, access to public space, inclusive public space with particular focus on vulnerable groups, a people-centred approach to planning public spaces, and the importance of including public space in the sustainable urban development agenda). These issues are essential not only to building good public spaces, but also to promoting key principles of sustainable urban development – such as integration instead of segregation, compactness instead of sprawl and connectivity instead of congestion.

Museums of the World: An Exchange of Ideas

Today, the term “museum” covers an extraordinary variety of institutions spread over all parts of the world. Through its long and fascinating history, the museum has touched upon almost all aspects of human experience, creation and knowledge. How, then, should we understand this institution that itself claims to understand almost anything? What role can this historic institution play in a rapidly changing, globalised and interconnected world?

A conversation with Director Bruce J. Altshuler, New York University, Beatrix Ruf, Director Stedelijk Museum and Jasper Sharp, Adjunct Curator Kunsthistorisches Museum Wien. The panel discussion will be led by Daniel Birnbaum, Director Moderna Museet. Moderna Museet, March 3rd, 2015

Museums of the World: Towards a New Understanding of a Historical Institution

Throughout its history, the museum has always had a profound impact on human knowledge, identity and politics. As an institution it has shaped our view of the world and been crucial in spreading values from humanism and tolerance to nationalism and other political agendas. It retains its influential position today, while meeting new demands in a changing world.

Future of Places (Urban City Research): Public space in the new urban agenda

The Future of Places forum was arranged and financed by Axel and Margaret Ax:son Johnson foundation in collaboration with UN Habitat, Project for Public Spaces, SDI, Citynet and INU. The overall purpose was to indicate the importance of public space and placemaking in city planning at Habitat III 2016.

Over the course of three years, the Future of Places partners and participants have reflected on the importance of public space as the connective matrix on which healthy and prosperous cities grow. Its aim was to prevent this issue from being overlooked in the negotiations surrounding the Post 2015 Development Agenda and the Third United Nations Conference on Housing and Urban Development (Habitat III), the Future of Places was assembled. The discussions that took place over the three Future of Places conferences and additional supporting events have been captured in a carefully crafted set of key messages.

1) People-centered approach to planning, 2) Inclusive public space for all, particularly vulnerable groups, 3) Public space that respects human scale and behavior, 4) A citywide network of connected streets and public spaces, 5) Economic productivity of public space, 6) Access to public space – public and private spheres, 7) Sustainable public spaces that are healthy, safe, resilient, energy-conserving and resource efficient, 8) Culture and context of public space.

Book Launch and Lecture: Hilma af Klint – The Art of Seeing the Invisible
Axel and Margaret Ax:son Johnson Foundation has launched the essay volume Hilma af Klint – The Art of Seeing the Invisible. This volume of essays contains many of the lectures given in conjunction with the exhibition Hilma af Klint – A Pioneer of Abstraction that took place during 2013 and 2014 at Moderna Museet in Stockholm, Engelsberg Manor in Sweden, Hamburger Bahnhof Museum in Berlin and the Museum of Modern Art in Louisiana, Denmark. Scholars and experts in abstract art, art history, history of ideas and cultural and religious studies have made important contributions. The topics range from early abstract art, the impact of Darwinism, Goethe’s colour theory, as well as the importance of occult religious movements such as theosophy and anthroposophy that influenced the early modernists, to Hilma af Klint’s own personal diary notes and research.

Dr. Julia Voss gave a lecture on Hilma af Klint and the Evolution of Art, followed by a discussion with Artistic Director Sam Thorne from Tate St Ives. Henie Onstad Kunstsenter, Oslo Norway, October 2nd, 2015

Museums of the World: Cultural Heritage at Risk – The Role of Museums in War and Conflict
Today, the ongoing violence in the Middle East provides a severe challenge to our cultural heritage. How do we protect and safeguard our cultural heritage in the face of terror and deliberate destruction? How has the museum faced this task historically?
What are the safeguarding methods available today? What security measures are in place to keep objects and art works from falling into the wrong hands or being sold on the black market? How do Interpol and Unesco deal with this difficult task? Can looting be prevented? How can museums and the academic world respond to these challenges? And last but not least, what is the role and meaning of original objects for mankind’s collective memory and understanding of history? These and other questions were discussed together by experts from British, French, German, US and Nordic institutions as well as experts on Iraqi, Libyan and Syrian heritage to provide an overview of how the different ways in which the museum world can respond.

Axess Magazine

Axess Magazine, founded by the Axel and Margaret Ax:son Johnson Foundation for Public Benefit in February 2002, is based in Stockholm and devoted chiefly to the liberal arts and social sciences. Axess is the leading book review magazine in Sweden.

The magazine is committed, above all, to quality of thought and writing, but without being defined by a single perspective. The hallmark of Axess is the essay, characterised by a probing, investigative approach. The magazine is open to differing arguments and standpoints, driven by reason rather than polemic.

Axess unites academic culture and publishing culture creating a forum in which scholars in the social sciences, humanities and liberal arts can meet a wider public audience.

In its theme section, Axess allows different academic disciplines to focus upon central issues from various perspectives. Diverse viewpoints are illuminated and juxtaposed. Axess begins where discussions in most other media generally end and scrutinises them analytically and empirically. Axess also attaches great importance to the international range of its writers, and includes an extensive review section to cover the most important new non-fiction books being published worldwide.

March 2002 No. 1 Theme: Globalisation

A ball was set rolling: Sunil Khilnani wrote about India continuing to open up to the outside world and finding a new image of its identity. Hernando de Soto wrote about the world’s poor being unable to convert their assets into capital. In an interview with Amartya Sen, he talked about our identities being manifold and impossible to capture in such categories as civilisations.

APRIL 2002 NO. 2 THEME: THE GREYING SOCIETY

We cannot scale down: Gunnar Wetterberg wrote about all the phases of life being prolonged – except for the working phase. We need to work longer, but in different ways. Karl-Olov Arnestberg wrote about the impossibility of scaling down in present-day society. Those who don’t stay young find their value exhausted. Merete Mazzarella wrote that to stay young is to stagnate. Coherent living and wisdom are possible, even in the fragmented world of today.

MAY 2002 NO. 3 THEME: THE TRIPLE SOCIETY

Drawing new boundaries on the computer screens: Lars Magnusson explained that a taboo in Swedish economic debate is about to be broken – national interest confronts the boundlessness of globalisation. Mats Benner wrote about Sweden being divided in three – metropolises of knowledge and certain branches of industry are growing stronger, other parts are on a downward slope. Orvar Löfgren wrote about the Öresund Bridge having become a barrier, all utopian dreams notwithstanding – but now the real history is beginning to be written.

JUNE 2002 NO. 4 THEME: GENETICS AND INTEGRITY

A dangerous shortcut to the future: in an interview with the German philosopher Robert Spaemann, he warned that the cannibalism of genetics can lead to a new and hazardous view of humanity. Ludvig Beckman wrote that political answers are needed to the ethical questions of genetics. The state must begin to act. Lynn Åkesson asked who owns our genes. Violating the integrity of the individual can be the same as violating the human race.
SEPTEMBER 2002 NO. 5 THEME: WAR IN PEACE

The fronts have vanished: Martin van Creveld wrote of terror as the face of the new warfare. In an era of terrorist outrages, the distinction between military and civilian is being lost. Lars Nicander wrote of how, in the war of information, the boundaries between peace, crisis and war are obliterated. Policing and military activity cannot be separated. Caroline Holmqvist wrote about how military assignments on contract turn war, formerly the concern of states, into a market commodity.

OCTOBER 2002 NO. 6 THEME: STOICISM

Controlling oneself or being controlled: Eva-Carin Gerö wrote of how, by mastering extensive fields of knowledge, the Stoics found the way to self-control. Bo Lindberg wrote of how the Stoic attitude has provided inspiration and firmness in hard times throughout history. Karin Johannisson wrote that in contemporary society self-control has acquired a double meaning, leading to both deadlock and passion.

NOVEMBER 2002 NO. 7 THEME: EU OFF-BEAT

The European Union isn’t working in unison: Lars Magnusson wrote that the welfare system used to give the EU political legitimacy but now it lacks a sustaining idea for the future. Fritz W. Scharpf wrote that the EU’s rival models of welfare must be allowed to remain. It is in relation to the outside world that it should act of one accord. Nicholas Fraser wrote about anxious Europeans using the United States as a hate image. The fortress now under construction leads to constriction.

DECEMBER 2002 NO. 8 THEME: CO-OP CAPITALISM

Big participation gave little power. Eva Redhe, Karin Thorburn and Lena Torlegård warn that if owner power fails to materialise, the whole business sector risks losing credibility. Christina Garsten and Anna Hasselström wrote that in global money markets, local networks are decisive. Sofia Nerbrand wrote of the weakness of ownership, despite more and more people owning shares. The Swede is a small saver and no capitalist.

FEBRUARY 2003 NO. 1 THEME: AFRICA’S RENAISSANCE

Innovation encountering tradition: Patrick Chabal wrote that the 1960s hopes of democracy and prosperity have not been fulfilled. An Africanisation of Africa is in progress. Anders Carlsson considered science and technology as important ingredients of South Africa’s vision of the future. The aim is an African renaissance. Pernilla Ståhl wrote that after the Rainbow Alliance’s election victory in Kenya put an end to dictatorship, the corruption of the old regime must be banished.

MARCH 2003 NO. 2 THEME: AFTER THE CORPORATE GIANTS

A new economic model for Sweden: Mats Benner wrote about the consequences of the big corporations being bought up by foreign countries and Sweden’s lack of a nursery for new talents. Denmark has never had any companies in the top division and therefore, Klaus Nielsen maintained, is better equipped for coping with economic change. In Sweden the hope is that a spate of SMEs will arise from the ashes of the big corporations, but a case study from Uppsala by Alexandra Waluszewski did little to corroborate the existence of any such phoenix vision.

APRIL 2003 NO. 3 THEME: GENERATION SHIFT

Security in sight: Neil Howe and William Strauss discussed how the American millennium generation is engineering a social security revolution. Jürgen Zinnecke wrote about consumption and loyalty to the system being the focus of attention for young people in Germany. Kay Glans wrote about Swedish youngsters as collective individualists, building their identity in the group.

MAY 2003 NO. 4 THEME: POOR MIDDLE CLASS

Grim outlook for the industrious: Paul Krugman considered how America’s hardworking middle class has lost its standing.
as wealth flows into the pockets of the few. Fredrik Bergström and Robert Gidehag wrote that honest toil is wretchedly rewarded in Sweden. It is impossible for people to improve their lot by working. In an interview, Ulrich Beck describes cosmopolitan commitment as the middle stratum’s only chance. That is how global capital can be challenged.

JUNE 2003 NO. 5 THEME: THE RESURRECTION OF TRUTH
The Soap of Truth is Slippery, but It Exists by Arne Jarrick
Revisionism is Next to Relativism by Sten Widmalm
Truth Exists, but the Question is How by Dag Prawitz

SEPTEMBER 2003 NO. 6 THEME: THE RENAISSANCE OF THE CITY STATE

Genetic Axess – Man from Creature to Creator

The 20th century was dominated by a number of utopian movements such as communism and Nazism which endeavoured to transform human nature radically. In biological science today, advanced efforts are being made to change the basic terms of human life. Biological science will perhaps succeed where those ideologies failed – in creating a new human being. Developments that we have only been able to see in sci-fi films until now are on the point of coming true. Dr. Panayiotis Zavos, whom some have called the Dr. Frankenstein of our time, appears in the series Genetic Axess: Man from Creature to Creator.

Three documentaries introduced us to some of Sweden’s and the world’s leading researchers and critics of genetic research. Provocateur Dr. Zavos claimed to be already capable of cloning human beings, and Georg Klein argued that science must work with no regard for opinions. They were strongly opposed by the feminist researcher and critic Hilary Rose.

Participants: Sverre Sjölander, Kenan Malik, Lee M Silver and others.
